ROUEN, FRANCE

The Mystery of the Telemaque

Not far from Rouen, nestled in a bend of the Seine, lies the quaint town of Quillebeuf-sur-Seine, shrouded in thick mystery surrounding one of France's most legendary treasures. It is January 8, 1790. The Telemaque, an 80-foot brigantine weighing 120 tons and built in 1772, had set sail from Rouen a few days earlier, carrying a cargo of tallow and nails destined for Brest. As the ship approached Quillebeuf-sur-Seine, it was forced to anchor to secure itself during the passage of a tidal bore. The crew tied the Telemaque firmly to the dock, but the waves were so fierce that they barely had time to evacuate before the vessel sank just 100 meters from the quay, taking a young sailor down with it.

The story could have ended there, but years later, in 1818, an astonishing turn of events occurred. Louis XVIII, the brother of the guillotined King Louis XVI, attempted to salvage the wreck. Although this effort proved futile, it sparked wild speculation. This intrigue was enough to ignite the legend of the Telemaque, which, alongside the Treasure of the Kings of France, was rumored to also conceal the riches of the Church, recently stripped of its real estate and needing to safeguard its movable assets.

Over the centuries, numerous salvage operations took place, all unsuccessful except for one in 1938, which managed to recover the ship's bow. Among the items found were shoe buckles, crucifixes, and a stunning gold chain that once held a bishop's pectoral cross. While it was a disappointment for treasure hunters, experts believe that the real treasure lies in the ship's stern, which became detached after a collision with an English brig. Thus, the legendary treasure remains hidden beneath the waters of the Seine, safeguarding the tale of the Telemaque and the fabulous Treasure of the Kings of France for over 250 years.
